Description :

Prsentation de l'diteurThis book is about the coming of age of a French girl born into conservative society in Paris, France, in which a woman's role was limited to serving her husband while living in his shadow. She had other plans. Studying law and then Japanese was how she chose to progress towards independence. She became an international business lawyer. Besides providing this personal account, this book also offers insights into the world of business and of legal practice as seen through the eyes of a woman who had to contend with the challenge of the infamous glass ceiling in the French corporate environment. Finally, this is an account of a special relationship she developed with Japan through her experience with Japanese friends and business clients, whose endearing features are rarely mentioned in the literature. Her rich experience over thirty years as a lawyer and as a corporate executive makes this book informative. Her lively, humorous style makes it entertaining, especially in view of the fact that she chose humor as a prime weapon when fighting sexist prejudice and obnoxious behavior.
